French law has now abandoned the principle established by the old case law of the Court of Cassation, known as Canal de Craponne, which prevented, in the name of the binding force of the contract, the modification of its content even if the circumstances would have changed (Cass. civ. 6 March 1876). Over time, legal temperaments have thus been ...

Historically, French law is very favorable to arbitration, and to international arbitration in particular. It is against this background that it has recognized the principle of autonomy of arbitral awards for several decades. As a result, French law authorizes the recognition and enforcement in France of a foreign award, even if it has been set aside in its country of origin.

A new conception of law appeared in France: statute was deemed the basic source of law. Customs remained only if they could not be replaced by statutes. The Parlements, the major courts of the nation, were dismantled and replaced by a unified system of courts that were merely supposed to apply the law and never to lay down general rules.
