Alan Bennett has the most delightful voice for these children's classics. The comedic episodes of the Wind in the Willows were an absolute joy to hear. His telling of the timeless tales of Alice and Wonderland and Winnie the Pooh were also so much fun to hear. Great readers like Alan Bennett are one of the reasons I love listening to audio books.

Alan Bennett misses out one 'modest library' in Radcliffe Square in Oxford (LRB, 28 July). Brasenose College Main Library, which was completed in 1664, is an impressive room with a barrel-vaulted ceiling and views over the sublime, soaring architecture of Radcliffe Square, and, in the other direction, over Oxford's smallest quadrangle, Brasenose's ironically named Deer Park.

Having taught Alan Bennett's original Talking Heads to an adult A'Level group at the local college many years ago I have a soft spot for these fabulous works and couldn't believe it when I heard two new pieces had been written. My enormous thanks to Anna-Marie Fitzgerald at Profile Books for sending me a copy of Alan Bennett's Two Besides in return for an honest review.

Two Besides by Alan Bennett | Linda's Book Bag

Highlights for me included the autobiographical piece by Caitlin Moran; Lucy Maagan's rules for borrowing books from her hypothetical library and a more political piece by Zadie Smith. The only piece I was really disappointed by was the essay by Alan Bennett, which lacked his usual verve and humour, but I the other pieces more than made up for it.
